This study aims to determine the influence of self-efficacy toward the entrepreneurial intentions of SMKN Bangkalan students. This study applied a quantitative approach with probability sampling techniques. The respondents of this study were students of class XII vocational engineering and motorbike business and light vehicle engineering at SMKN 2 Bangkalan with a total of 106 respondents. The instruments of this study were self-efficacy scale and entrepreneurial intention scale. The analysis, which used in this study was a simple linear regression test with the aid of the SPSS 23 for windows program. The results of this study indicated $F_{311,336}$ with a significance of 0.000 smaller than 0.05 ($0.000 < 0.05$). This means that the hypothesis is accepted, that is, there is an influence of self-efficacy toward the entrepreneurial intentions of SMKN Bangkalan students. According to the value of the coefficient of determination (R Square) which is 0.75, means that self-efficacy affects entrepreneurial intentions by 75.0% and the other 25% are influenced by other factors. The correlation coefficient value (r) of 0.86 can be identified that the correlation with the category is powerful between the self-efficacy scale and entrepreneurial intentions.

Keywords: self-efficacy, entrepreneurial intentions.
